To deliver justice for all by 2030 in a world where billions of people are not yet able to obtain justice, we must resolve justice problems, prevent injustices from occurring, and use justice systems to create opportunities for people to participate fully in their societies and economies.
At the heart of the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development lies a vision of a just, equitable, tolerant, open, and socially inclusive world in which the needs of the most vulnerable are met.

SDG16.3 promises to ensure equal access to justice for all by 2030. Other justice-related targets cover legal identity, injustices such as corruption and illicit financial flows, and the promotion of rights and gender equality.

To achieve the goal of providing access to justice for all, we must:

- Place justice at the heart of sustainable development
- Put people at the center of justice systems
- Move from justice for the few to justice for all
Place justice at the heart of sustainable development

Justice is a thread that runs through all 17 Sustainable Development Goals. Without increased justice, the world will be unable to

- End poverty, reduce inequality, and reach the furthest behind first
- Create conditions for shared and sustainable prosperity
- Promote peace and inclusion, and protect fundamental rights

Put people at the center of justice systems

In the past, justice reforms have often focused on institutions that are distant from people. In contrast, a people-centered approach to justice

- Understands how men, women, and children experience justice and injustice
- Draws on evidence of what works to meet people’s justice needs
- Is delivered by an inclusive justice system open to partnership with other sectors

Move from justice for the few to justice for all

Closing the justice gap requires a transformation in ambition – a sustained effort to provide billions more people with access to justice to

- Help people resolve their justice problems
- Prevent injustices large and small from occurring
- Create opportunities for people to participate fully in their societies and economies
Why we need justice for all

To deliver the SDG targets that promise justice for all, we must understand the size of the justice gap and build a case for the investment needed to close it.

How many people are confronted by justice problems? What do they need and want when they seek justice? And what kind of justice do they receive?

Until recently, a lack of data has obscured the scale of the failure to meet people’s justice needs, but more and better data is now available.

Drawing on research by the world’s leading justice organizations and experts, the Task Force on Justice provides a first estimate of the global justice gap.

Closing the justice gap requires a transformation in ambition – a sustained effort to provide billions more people with access to justice.

Countries need to target investments to the most urgent justice needs, direct resources to lower-cost approaches, and diversify funding sources.
The Task Force has highlighted three dimensions of the global justice gap. In total, 5.1 billion people fall into at least one of these three groups. Around the world, women, children, poor people, people with disabilities, and people from ethnic minorities find it hardest to access justice. The justice gap is both a reflection of structural inequalities and a contributor to these inequalities.

- 4.5 billion are excluded from the social, economic, and political opportunities that the law provides.
- 1.5 billion have a criminal, civil, or administrative justice problem they cannot solve.
- 253 million live in extreme conditions of injustice, without any meaningful legal protections.

- Without justice, people and societies fail to reach their full potential.
- People with a justice problem lose an average of one month’s wages.
- Everyday justice problems cost countries 0.5-3% of their GDP.
- Every dollar invested in justice leads to $16 in benefits from reduced conflict risk.
- Expenditure on people-centered justice delivers a high return on investment.

Expenditure on people-centered justice delivers a high return on investment:
- $190 in high-income countries.
- $64 in middle-income countries.
- $20 in low-income countries.

Annual cost of providing a person with access to basic justice services.
In the past, justice reform has focused on buildings, processes, and institutions, but has failed to close the justice gap for billions of people.

Notwithstanding the differences between countries and the diversity of legal systems, surveys tell us that people across the world experience many of the same types of justice problems.

The greatest needs for justice are found in six areas:

- Violence and crime, in the public sphere, at work, and at home
- Problems with money and debt, or consumer problems
- Disputes over housing or land, or conflicts with neighbors
- Difficulties related to access to and quality of public services
- Family disputes, for example around divorce and inheritance
- Problems at work, whether as an employee or business owner
By taking people’s justice problems as a starting point, countries can design better justice journeys that help more people reach a destination where they believe their problems have been fairly resolved. Justice journeys should empower people, provide them with access to quality justice services, and help them achieve outcomes that lead to measurable increases in justice.
Preventing Injustice

Given the size of the justice gap, we must prevent justice problems as well as working to resolve those that have already occurred.

Prevention reduces the harm that people suffer by focusing on the root causes of injustice. When there are fewer disputes, lower levels of violence, and people have proper legal protections, societies are more likely to be peaceful and to prosper.

Prevention makes sense for four reasons:

- The justice gap cannot be bridged with traditional approaches and tools.
- Justice is needed for communities and societies, not just for individuals. Addressing the root causes of injustice is the best way to tackle structural justice problems.
- Justice systems can increase resilience, by helping people protect their rights or by providing space for peaceful contestation.
- Prevention is cost effective – for people, for society, and for the justice system itself.

Prevention requires justice actors to move from considering only individual justice problems to influencing how a population experiences injustice and justice.
Effective prevention requires the justice system to collaborate with other sectors to address the root causes of disputes and avert conflict, violence, and human rights abuses. Prevention strategies aim to create trustworthy justice systems, tackle structural injustices, and use the law to reduce the risk of injustice.

Preventing conflict and instability
Reducing grievances and addressing the risks that lead to violent conflict

Preventing criminal, organized, and interpersonal violence
From punitive measures to evidence-based prevention that reduces levels of violence, especially against women, children, and vulnerable groups

Promoting inclusion and protecting rights
Reducing abuses by the justice system and providing justice for those facing the highest levels of exclusion

Preventing and de-escalating disputes
Working proactively to reduce the number of disputes or resolve them before they become more serious

Promote trust in justice systems
Provide people with a reasonable expectation that their rights will be protected, their disputes managed peacefully, and that they will be safeguarded from abuses of power

Tackle the root causes of injustice
Provide legal identity and other documentation and empower communities and marginalized groups to realize their rights and overcome unfairness

Use the law to reduce risk
Strengthen legislative frameworks for violence prevention and implement laws and regulations that make it less likely that disputes will arise or escalate
Pathfinders for justice

The Task Force has developed an agenda for action that will help deliver the SDG targets that promise justice for all.

A shift to justice for all requires a new focus on delivering tangible results for people. Reformers around the world are beginning to transform their justice systems, providing lessons for others to learn from.

Four levers build momentum for reform:

- Use data and evidence to steer reform
- Unlock the transformative power of innovation
- Implement strategies for smarter justice financing
- Build more coherent and inclusive justice systems

The Task Force calls on governments, justice professionals, civil society, the private sector, international and regional organizations, foundations and philanthropists – and people themselves – to work together to deliver justice for all.
The Task Force makes a series of recommendations to accelerate progress towards justice for all. National implementation should be supported by intensified international cooperation and revitalized partnerships for justice.

Resolve the justice problems that matter most to people
Understand justice problems through regular surveys • Recognize, finance, and protect justice defenders • Provide access to people-centered justice services • Use cost-effective alternatives to help people resolve disputes and gain redress

Prevent justice problems and enable people to participate in their society and economy
Implement multi-sectoral prevention strategies • Increase independence, combat corruption, and ensure independent oversight • Tackle structural injustices • Strengthen laws and regulations to reduce the risk of violence and the number of disputes

Invest in justice systems and institutions that work for people and that are equipped to respond to their need for justice
Provide open access to justice data • Create a supportive regulatory environment for innovation • Develop a national roadmap for financing justice for all • Increase representation in the justice system and implement new governance models

Support national implementation
Register voluntary commitments to implement SDG16.3 and help governments develop credible, realistic, and funded strategies to implement these commitments

Measure progress
Agree a new SDG16.3 indicator to measure progress on civil justice

Increase justice leadership
Hold a biennial meeting of Ministers of Justice, Attorneys General, and other justice leaders

Intensify cooperation
Form an alliance of international and regional justice partners and a funders’ collaborative

Build the movement
Amplify demand for change through global, national, and local movements that campaign for justice for all
